LIBERTY CENTER DEPOT HISTORY

Compiled By John D. Swearingen, Jr.

An enterprising group of Ohio and Indiana business associates met in 1852 to plan and organize a railroad to move grain from Illinois and Indiana to Lake Erie. The topography of northwestern Ohio indicated an ideal route for the new Wabash line, and at the same time signed the death warrant for the Wabash and Erie Canal. Construction out of Toledo began in 1854, and ended in 1855 in New Haven, Indiana.

In the early 1860s, Liberty Center was being formed, but the railway had no intention of creating a stop for the town. On his own initiative then, Calvin Young, a local carpenter, built the first depot. Young served as agent and telegraph operator there for 20 years, and allowed the railway to use the depot free of charge.

Eventually, the Wabash Railroad decided to build their own depot, so Mr. Young's depot was sold to Oliver Hoffer around 1891. This depot has since been converted into the home at 361 Maple Avenue.

After the moving of the depot, the present structure was constructed. Although similar to other Wabash depots, Liberty Center's still remains unique. Each gable was adorned with wood fretwork and topped with ornate finials. A boardwalk also existed between the depot and the tracks. The floorplan of the Italianate style building reveals that it was a combination depot, created for passengers and freight. Both the waiting room and office were designed to accomodate pot belly stoves, and a ticket window once existed between the two rooms. In more recent years, the station's out buildings were torn down and the waiting room and part of the west end were converted into storage areas. Hopefully, with the help of local citizens, this depot can be reconstructed to its original condition inside and out. (Wood is illustrated later in this issue.)
